DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Crescent-shaped, castle-type bastion on Shute's Folly, a mile offshore East Battery, in Charleston Harbor's Hog Island Channel. Constructed 1808-1811 as an inner-harbor, secondary-defense fortress, the completely-brick wall remains -- a circle of brickwork in classic lines. Recently removed as first steps of excavation and restoration have been unrelated buildings dating from 20th century government use as a buoy construction and storage facility. Among artifacts that have been uncovered are a 10" Columbiad gun (this used a powder charge of 40 pounds and projectiles weighing 428 pounds, had an elevation of 20 degrees and a maximum range of just over 2 miles).

Earliest fort at this site was constructed of timber and earth during the Colonial period. A horseshoe battery had been designed as early as 1742 to extend fortifications from the Ashley River across the neck of Charles Town.

Against the French threat, in 1797, Charleston citizens subscribed funds for a fort of palisades and sand, "weak but worthy as a second line of defense."

Following 1804 hurricane destruction, the federal government acquired the site and, by 1809, was completing the fort as an enclosed work of masonry for two tiers of guns. Although Castle Pinckney had regressed, by 1826, to secondary importance as a harbor defense, regular maintenance was kept up, and thorough repair put it in shape for a garrison by 1831. In 1833, a heavy battery of 24-pounders was mounted and a timber palisade erected to protect the rear wall. Defenses greatly improved in this era. Various stages of strengthening and reduction of strength followed, including the 1864 sand and turf wall which Confederate defenses built within the fort.

In 1855, a light was installed on the island's eastern sector and was described in early lighthouse lists as a yellow tower with a light 50 feet above sea level. By 1880, a new harbor light had been erected on the south.

In 1884, the fort was dilapidated, with walls settled and cracked, gun carriages rotted away and guns buried in rubbish. It became an "interesting ruin."

In 1966, the property was obtained by the Sons of the Confederate Veterans to establish a museum and memorial monument.

The restoration program is in seven phases:

- (1) Excavation of fort interior and razing of buildings.
- (2) Pointing up brickwork in rounded walls of fort, replacement of the top to reach original level; opening sally port for ingress and egress at main ground level.
- (3) Provision of utilities, and a security program.
- (4) Construction of exhibits and archives rooms, preparation for memorials, furnishings, facilities, etc.
- (5) Landing barge or floating dock, salvaging heart pine deck of old dock.
- (6) Permanent boat for passengers.
- (7) Ultimate helicopter landing pad; basins for replicas of The Little David (the first submersible); possibly a restaurant.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Typical of the castle-type fortresses which guarded important early settlements, but which lost their effectiveness with the improvement of explosive shells and the development of rifle pieces, Castle Pinckney is believed to possibly the only horseshoe fort left in America which can be restored. The fort is a Charleston Harbor landmark and is historically interesting because it existed for such a long period of time, reflecting a number of colorful and significant events from the Colonial through the Confederate periods.

It is a reminder of early Colonial problems of fortification against sea attack by Spaniards, pirates and Indians. As early as 1736, plans were advanced to fortify the small, sandy marsh island which was a 1711 land grant to Col. Alexander Parris, commander of the provincial militia. Its name reflects the later owner, Joseph Shute, and preserves the Colonial custom of describing a Carolina sea island as a "folly."

The fort is a reminder of the Revolutionary War period. In the 1780 defense of Charles Towne, Gen. Benjamin Lincoln used the Castle Pinckney site as the terminal anchor for eight vessels sunk in the harbor to block the British fleet. It was included in Congressional authorization after the Revolution to strengthen the defenseless Atlantic coast.

It is a reflection of the late 18th century when Charlestonians, fearing a war with France, subscribed personal funds to improve harbor defenses and named the Shute's Folly fort for Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, Charlestonian who was President Washington's ambassador to France and famous for his stand against United States payment of any tribute.

Although the fort saw no action in the War of 1812, Secretary of War Eustis reported it was the most important fortification in Charleston harbor by the end of 1811.

During the Nullification years, Castle Pinckney was part of the steady build-up of Federal forces along the coast.

Castle Pinckney was the first ground seized by the Confederate military, an act some historians claim as the first overt act of war. This was accomplished Dec. 17, 1860, by a detachment of the S.C. Militia's 1st Regiment of Rifles under Col. J.J. Pettigrew and Maj. Ellison Capers. During 1861, the garrison guarded Federal prisoners taken during the Battle of First Manassas—about 65 members of the 11th New York Zouaves and another group, from the 69th Irish Regiment's Meagher Zouaves. Its occupation by Federal forces in February, 1865, ended Castle Pinckney's role as sentinel of Charleston.

Plans are completed for restoring the historic site and the effort has strong backing.
